Automated External Defibrillators (AED)

The Joint Purchasing Program has a contract with Cardiac Science, Inc. for the purchase of Defibrillators, T2130. Cardiac Science has determined certain AEDs manufactured between August 2003 and August 2009 may experience a rare product issue. These AEDs have resistors which may fail and the failure will not be detected by the AEDs' periodic self-tests.

With approximately 300,000 Cardiac Science AEDs in use, this issue contributed to an AED's inability to deliver therapy in two reported occurrences over a period spanning more than six years. The probability that this would occur in your AED is remote.

There is no recall or replacement of the AED. Cardiac Science will send a letter of explanation to all entities that have ordered the AED.

By May, 2010 Cardiac Science will have a software update available that enhances the AED's self-test capability to detect this issue. In the interim, Cardiac Science advises you to keep your AED in service and regularly check the status indicator on the front of the AED.
